Statement concerning Conflict Minerals

Dear customers,

We have received increasing numbers of enquiries about the use of conflict minerals related to the "Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform" and the "Consumer Protection Act (Wall Street Reform Act)" that came into force in July 2010. This reform requires companies using certain minerals to document and publish information, which is supposed to ensure that no conflict minerals are used in their products.

With this letter, we would like to inform you as a customer of AMI Elektronik GmbH & Co. Produktions KG that in our products we use only electronic parts and components from well-known manufacturers and distributors in whom we have placed our trust for many years. However, as a manufacturer of end devices we do not have any influence on the origin of materials used in our parts and components from suppliers. In this regard we are unable to take any responsibility. With regard to our suppliers we are committed to traceability and transparency in their products and many manufacturers and distributors publish information on their websites about the properties of the materials.

We have obtained the relevant information from our suppliers and according to our current state of knowledge, no conflict materials are used.

We do not import minerals or so-called conflict materials directly and therefore according to our current state of knowledge no conflict materials are used in our products.

Please understand that we are unable to complete any special questionnaires on this subject due to the increasing numbers of enquiries we have been receiving.

We hope, however, that this letter provides you with the required information and would like to take this opportunity to thank you for your trust and cooperation.
